Activating programs like Microsoft Windows and Microsoft Office may seem like a trivial endeavor to some people, but in reality these activations are worth millions in revenue for the company. This activation process ensures that only legally obtained copies of the program are being used by customers across the globe. Buying one of these activation codes is surprisingly easy and takes just minutes to complete. In fact, it is considered an important security measure by most companies and organizations. Activated software often has a watermark included in the original software; this mechanism helps to confirm that the code was indeed obtained and installed properly. Since the release of Windows 8, Microsoft offers a new product key system which is based on digital codes and not alphabetic characters as before. Apart from the eight letters of Windows 8, all Windows versions require a product key as well as a digital code which can be used to validate and activate it. After entering a valid key/code into Windows 10, one will be asked to "re-activate" their copy of Windows 10 using this product key/code. You can then choose whether or not to accept that request. If you accept the request, Windows 10 will automatically "re-activate" itself and place a green tick next to your copy of Windows. This is because Microsoft has decided to ditch the traditional retail model it has run for so long in favor of a new app store-based model which, for many businesses, means more money. This means that while the latest version of Windows 10 still costs $99.99, users can also upgrade their systems by acquiring Microsoft's other software products over time, such as Office 365 or Visual Studio. The company isn't alone in shifting its focus to other revenue sources beyond desktop operating systems.
